For five years, the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program (DACA) has given nearly 800,000 hopeful young strikers brought to the United States as children the legal protections they need to work and study in this country, despite the immigration status of their parents.

DACA decision

Known as “Dreamers,” these young people have deep stakes in the U.S. Through DACA, they've achieved many of the milestones that frame the American dream: earning better wages to support their families, pursuing higher education, buying cars, and setting down roots in their communities through home ownership. They are students in our classrooms, teachers in our schools, soldiers in our armed forces, leaders in our cities and towns. They represent the best of us. Those who qualify for deferred action pose no threat to public safety or national security.
